In order to develop new and more efficient processes for producing biofuels from biomass, the conversion of organic compounds from a wide variety of sources must be studied in the laboratory and the biotechnological processes must be checked for their stability and efficiency. Although the main reactions taking place in anaerobic digestion processes can be predicted, their details are extremely complex and depend on the type of feedstock and the specific conditions of the process. Most of the knowledge on microbial processes has been obtained from studies on pure cultures (mainly related to protein expression and microbial community structure) and from batch experiments, only a few studies using continuous reactors have been performed. In this work, the major transformations that take place in a biogas reactor were evaluated using a continuous test system. The organic substrates were organic waste (swine manure) and glucosinolates released by alfalfa. Glycine, alkenyl succinic acid and biomass grown on long chain alcohols were used as specific substrates. This work confirmed the potential of the system for converting protein-rich nitrogenous substrates and the potential of alfalfa for releasing glucosinolates during a biogas reaction. Additionally, the selected conditions of the biogas reactor can be used to improve the chemical composition of the produced biogas.A TABLESPOON of collagen powder could make a tiny difference to your health. However, a new study has shown that oral supplements containing the same amount of collagen can increase your risk of developing cancer, stroke, heart attack or type 2 diabetes, compared to the risk for women who didn't take it. Women who took a quarter of a teaspoon of collagen per day were 12% more likely to develop cancer and 33% more likely to experience heart problems, compared with women who didn't take it, after 10 years. Men who took the same amount of collagen were 15% more likely to develop heart disease and 30% more likely to have a heart attack. The supplement
