Chaloops are an exciting combination of modern and classic forms that can be used for decorative or headline purposes. The typeface is available as regular and bold versions and includes three weights, allowing it to be used for both text and display purposes. Today's Editor's Pick is an elegant, free serif typeface called Six by Harry Porter. It's created to look good on a computer screen and usefully large for a broad range of text and display purposes. The typeface is available in three weights: Light, Regular, and Bold. It also includes the alternate characters, subscript, superscript, and non-standard fractions. The sample shown on the right is done in Photoshop and the one on the left is done in Illustrator. Today's Editor's Pick is a free serif typeface called Eighteen by Morten Buldo. It's a very elegant font designed for headings and subheadings. On the left, you can see the Roboto font being used for a headline. On the right, the font is used to create some amazing logotypes for bands including the Black Angels, the Moter, A.S.C.R., and Delta Spirit. Roboto is a free, sans-serif typeface from Google that can be used for text and display purposes. It is particularly versatile because of the wide range of weights and styles available in the font, which gives it the ability to be used for both design and print projects. The font is completely free to use for any personal, commercial, or non-profit use and can be downloaded for free at Roboto. The lovely Daystar Mono by Kevin Link is an option to consider if you are looking for a serif font with a unique look that will serve you well for a variety of purposes. It comes with a wealth of OpenType features such as stylistic sets, ligatures, and multiple alternate characters. The font comes in a regular and bold weight and the file is available in Adobe Illustrator and Adobe Photoshop. Today's Editor's Pick is a 82157476af
